Getting listed on Yahoo should be without doubt one of the most important missions on any Internet marketers mind. Yahoo is the biggest of all the search engines, well actually that's not true, you see Yahoo is not technically a search ENGINE it is a human compiled directory of websites that does not have a spiderbot going to sites and indexing them. However for the sake of this article when I say search engines I am referring to all 'search sites'.

Did you know that recent estimates show that Yahoo is currently capturing an amazing 40% of all search engine traffic online? Do you know what this means? It means that almost 1 out of every 2 people that do searches on the Internet use Yahoo, everyone on the Internet has done searches some time or another.

Nothing in the world should be clearer to anyone with a website whose just after reading the above figures. You need your site listed in Yahoo. ASAP.

To recap if your site is not listed in the Yahoo index you're losing lots of potential customers to competitors that are listed in Yahoo. With the amount of visitors Yahoo can send you even with an average listing this could amount to hundreds, maybe thousands of dollars worth of lost profit. Lost profit is never good in business. A point to note here is that being listed under webpages does not mean you're listed in Yahoo, it in fact means you're listed with Google because Yahoo gets webpage results from Google.

You now know how important it is to be listed in Yahoo. Let's move on to the good stuff, the main body of this Yahoo submitting tips article - how to submit to Yahoo.

First you've to determine the scope of your site. Is your site commercial or noncommercial? Commercial sites that want to be listed by Yahoo now must use "Business Express" when submitting. This service previously cost a once off figure of $199, however the price has since risen to $299 a year.

"Business Express" what is it? Good question and one that many people ask, well it's basically the same as free submit except that with business express your site is guaranteed to be reviewed within a week's time. Please be aware however that it does not guarantee that your site will be accepted and added to the Yahoo index, it simply guarantee's a timely review of your application.

If your site is rejected Yahoo will allow you to appeal for free within a certain time scale (usually 30 days) of being informed of your rejection. Yahoo staff usually include in your rejection the reasons you have been rejected. You should examine these reasons and fix any problems then resubmit after a week or so.

If your site is a noncommercial entity, you'll still be able to submit for free, but a review could take as long as 8 weeks or might never happen at all.

Before you submit make sure your site is 100% ready, under construction pages need not apply to Yahoo because they're not going to get in. Your site should be aesthetically pleasing to the reviewer, be quick loading and of course should have lots of good content.

OK let's get started. How does Yahoo return results? Search results on Yahoo are determined by words that appear within these four areas:

- 1) Category,
- 2) title,
- 3) description and
- 4) URL.

Websites which contain the search term within these areas are sorted by relevance using an automated algorithm. I will now go through these four different factors and explain how to optimize your submittal for each one. Yahoo categoryFirst up is category selection, many people don't realize this but when someone searches for a term(s) on Yahoo its algorithm searches through the category name also. To see this visit <http://www.yahoo.com> and do a search on 'Internet marketing articles'. You will see under each listing that these words are highlighted if they are in the name of the category. The top listing has the most occurrences of these words between its title, description, URL and words in the category it's in.

You should remember this when submitting to your category. In trying to establish what category you are going to submit to you should do a search for one or two of your keywords and see what categories come up. Which of these categories do you submit to though?

Since most referrals to sites from Yahoo come from the search results and not from people visiting certain categories, it is wise and best (in most occasions) to submit to a very specific category with lots of keywords in the category name. To see this strategy in practice revisit the results page for 'Internet marketing articles' on <http://www.yahoo.com> and notice that the top ranked site is in a category with lots of keywords. These are: Internet, Business, Advertising and Web, these combined with various keywords in the title, description and URL combine to give this site a pretty good chance at ranking well on a few good keywords and phrases. Therefore category names are just like having more titles and descriptions.

As a side note, if you're a regional operation try to pick a category with the name of your state or province in it. This will help you get more targeted visitors from Yahoo.

I said in most occasions a little higher up the page, well here's why it's not the best policy in all occasions. Imagine if your business name or official website name began with an A or any other alphabetically high character and someone goes into a general high level category and there you are listed in the top few sites, you could receive lots of traffic from a category listing like this.

Basically what I'm saying here is that if the title you're submitting (i.e.. your official business or website name) is alphabetically very high then you'd want to compromise between a lower level very specific keyword rich category and an upper level more general category in the hope that you'd receive more visitors because you would be listed high on the page due to your alphabetically high title.

Personally I'd try to get into the most general category possible on all occasions and rely on the keywords in my title, URL and description to get a good ranking in the search results. Yahoo titleAs for the title Yahoo insists that you use your official business or website name when applying to them. If you submit some keyword rich title they won't even look twice at your application. You should take this into account when choosing a domain name/official website name.

I did - AKA Marketing - 'A' is useful in getting listed high in general categories as discussed earlier. AKA is an abbreviation so I can 'get away' with having AKA all caps which again helps with the category strategy. It includes a good keyword - Marketing and they can't accuse me of applying to them with a keyword rich title, can they?

Yahoo favors short titles, this stems from the fact that the shorter the title is the less likely they will be to edit it. This of course means less work for them. However if you follow the above guidelines and indeed Yahoo's own onsite guidelines chances are you won't get edited down, but don't take my word for it. Yahoo descriptionThe description part I think is the tricky bit. The website description posted with your URL is a big factor in how your site will rank once it's listed in the directory.

You have to submit a description which has your main keywords in it and make it sound very appealing to potential visitors at the same time. You can't however have anything that resembles hype and bragging, examples of hype might include phrases like - 'number 1 site on the net for', 'The best on the web for'.

Yahoo will either edit it to something that doesn't benefit you at all or just move on to the next application, the latter being the most likely. If they do edit it you can bet your keywords won't appear in the final listing, for these reasons it is important to get it right first time.

The description should be concise and based on facts, most importantly it should include your most important keywords whenever possible. Do not exaggerate what is located on your site. Remember a real person reviews your site and in the end if your site is not as you described it, it will not get listed, it's as simple as that.

The length of the description should be about 10 - 15 words. Note however on the Yahoo submittal form they say 25 is the maximum. Never go near this number, they are sure to edit it and mess with your keywords. Refer to Yahoo's own words

"Please be brief".

Sometimes people email me asking this question "does my title and description that I submit to Yahoo have to be the same as the meta description tag and title tag on my site?". I always give them the simple answer of NO!

We have already discussed some of the issues regarding domain name choice and Yahoo above, however there are others. Most notable the whole 63 character thing. This allows for very long keyword rich domain names. Should you decide to pursue this strategy, don't go mad and use up nearly all 63 characters because Yahoo reviewers won't like it, do however use long domain names to your advantage. Get ones with your main keyphrases in it, and have these words separated by hyphens (-), because Yahoo's algorithm likes hyphens it may give you a rankings boost. Remember also to try for alphabetically high domains, which are plausible and make sense. If you can that is.

Some experts question the merit of keyword rich domains as a way of gaining an advantage over other sites in Yahoo. I however have seen this strategy in action and it does give advantage, most of the time it's only a slight advantage but we're talking about Yahoo here, a small advantage can mean a lot more visitors. To see why I believe in keyword rich domains, go to <http://www.yahoo.com> and enter in "linking strategies". WHAT SITE COMES UP!

Another tip for getting a Yahoo listing is to include an about us page on your site as Yahoo likes to know who it's dealing with. On this page describe what you do honestly and also post the physical address of your business or the building your website is run from.

In closing I would like to mention a very important point. Don't under any circumstances spam Yahoo, if they notice your submitting your site more than every two or three months they'll just forget about you and move on.

Well that's it - I hope you enjoyed reading this Yahoo submitting tips article as much as I have enjoyed writing it. Good luck in your quest for Yahoo success.
